The Origins Of Hertfordshire

The word Hertfordshire (Saxon "Heorotfordscir" or "Heorotfordscír") is attested from 866. The first reference (as "Heoroford") in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle is for 1011, but the county's true origins lie in the 10th century, when Edward the Elder established two burhs in Hertford in 912 and 913 respectively.

History of Hertfordshire - Wikipedia

Hertfordshire is often described as an 'unremarkable' county, lacking a clearly defined identity and, lying close to London, extensively suburbanised. In fact it has a long and complex history and a rich archaeological heritage; developments in the remote past continue to shape its character and appearance to the present day.

The original campus for the University was at Roe Green in Hatfield. However, it was not a University; it began as a Technical College. From the late 17th century, the land at Roe Green was owned by the Gape family of St Michael's Manor in St Albans. In the 1920s, they sold the land to Hill, a farmer, who then sold it to Alan Butler.
